

Finding the Magic Bullet

For years I searched for the magic bullet. You know, the one that would solve my problems and make my life easier. I dare say, most of the human population has joined me in this quest at one time or another.

I've looked for this magic bullet in religion and hoped I could find it in books. I've searched through doctor's offices and listened to tapes of well known people who might be able to provide me with this ever elusive magic. I've studied philosophies from around the world and became involved with different groups of like-minded people working to put it all together, to find this magic bullet. I've listened to mystics and healers and others whom I thought had found the answers to this universal search. I've experienced and experimented through different modalities of spiritual research to find this magical bullet. And what I found was everything I did held a piece of that magic bullet, and every person I met held knowledge of it. I found pieces of it in people no one would ever suspect as being spiritual or enlightened, people I came in contact with everyday who had more knowledge and more understanding of what I was searching for than I did, for the answers are given freely to all regardless of status or belief.

Ultimately, I found that this magic bullet, this evasive and ever-puzzling magic bullet, could not be found outside of me, for it was – in it's entirety – inside of me in a place so sacred that I was stunned to discover it was there.

Sometimes I still search for more of this magic outside myself, but I've come to realize that it needs to resonate within my own sacred space to be true regardless of who or where I learn it from. I continue to meet wonderful people who enlighten and teach me love and acceptance each step of the way, and that is yet another joy and challenge in my continuing unfolding of growth and realization. No-one is an island unto themselves, and through my searching and the searching of countless others, we continue to web and connect to the magic inside each one of us, to the sense of personal responsibility and truth.